

DYSLEXIA

How to identify dyslexia

If your child is struggling with dyslexia, it is highly likely that they will be experiencing a number of the following problems.

What to do

If you believe that your child may be dyslexic, your first port of call should be to speak to their school. If possible, arrange to meet your child's form teacher and the SENCO who may wish to perform a screening test and may be able to advise an assessment for your child. If there are long waiting lists for assessments, you may consider managing the process privately and then sharing the findings with your SENCO in order to devise a plan for school support.

How to help your child at home

Once your child has been assessed and dyslexia has been confirmed, you should then discuss the findings with the SENCO at your child's school. Dyslexia affects children in different ways and so it is important to establish your child's most effective method of learning so that you can support them at home with the right material.

How we can help

S6 can organise a formal assessment for you and work with you to understand the most appropriate learning plan for your child.

Our range of traditional and technology based resources ensures that our highly experienced tutors can prevent dyslexia from hindering your child's education.

Arrange an assessment now